

Even Small Businesses Can Face An Employment Claim

In today's workplace, small business owners must protect themselves from employment claims brought by their employees, leased employees, independent contractors, applicants for employment and even clients, customers and vendors. Discrimination, sexual harassment and wrongful termination are just some of the charges that employees and others can file at any time.

Exposures are increasing for every business, regardless of size. The workforce is as demographically diverse as ever. Social and cultural trends such as religious and political differences, the use of social media, and even telecommuting requests are changing the face of today's workplace.

It's Not Just About Federal Law

At the same time, the legal environment is placing even more legal responsibility on business owners regarding these types of wrongful employment behavior.

In addition to the federal statutes, businesses must be aware of state and local jurisdictional employment discrimination laws, which typically provide even broader protection for the employee, not the employer.

State and local ordinances often have a broader list of protected classes beyond color, race, national origin, religion, age, sex and pregnancy such as weight, criminal background, sexual orientation, political affiliation, and others. And under a number of federal statutes and state/local ordinance laws, compliance requires that all businesses and organizations, regardless of the number of employees must comply with these laws. This means that no business or organization is above the law.
